RE: Support for confirmation of Richard Cordray to full term as director of the CFPB

Dear Senator,

We are writing to urge you to confirm Richard Cordray to a full term as director of the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau (CFPB). AFR is a coalition of more than 250 national, state, and local groups who have come together to advocate for a fairer and safer financial system. Members of AFR include consumer, civil rights, investor, retiree, community, labor, faith-based, and business groups along with academics and independent experts.

Director Cordray has clearly demonstrated that he is the right man for the job. His fitness for the post was apparent when he was first nominated, and his performance has only ratified that conclusion. Support for his re-nomination has come from far and wide. Consumer, community, civil rights, labor, senior, and small business and local government organizations have praised his work. Bank and financial industry leaders have also commended the Bureau for its openness, thoughtfulness, and balanced and responsible approach under his leadership. Director Cordray's swift confirmation is needed both to eliminate any uncertainty about the CFPB's authority and to enable the agency to deliver on its promise to "make markets for consumer financial products and services work for Americans."

In that context, we remain deeply troubled by the letter from 43 Senators declaring their refusal to consider – or even allow a vote to consider – any nominee to lead the Consumer Bureau unless it is dramatically weakened. This position amounts to an attempt by a minority in the Senate to overturn a bill passed by both the House and the Senate, signed into law by the President, and supported by large majorities of the American people, across lines of party and geography. If the signers follow through on their threat, they will be putting the economic security of American families at risk, introducing a damaging new element of uncertainty into the consumer finance markets, and subverting the democratic process.

The letter describes the CFPB director as having "nearly unprecedented powers." We are now about 18 months into the operation of the Bureau with a director at its head and that claim has no credibility. Independent funding is a feature of all the bank regulatory agencies; indeed the CFPB is the only such agency with a hard-cap limit on its funding. Arthur E. Wilmarth of George Washington University, one of the country's leading authorities on administrative law, points out that stable and independent funding is important because it makes it easier for agencies to resist industry pressure and to protect the public interest. The CFPB also shares its single-director structure with another crucial bank regulator, the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency (OCC). Agencies with three or five-member commissions, as the CFPB's critics advocate, often fall into partisan gridlock. And the CFPB already faces a number of serious checks on its power.

Its rules, unlike those of its peer agencies, can be vetoed by a committee of financial regulators known as the Financial Stability Oversight Council. The Bureau's operations are also subject to regular oversight by Congress. And it is the only bank regulator that must comply with an additional set of small-business regulatory review requirements.

The Bureau's current funding mechanism and structure are important to its functioning effectively to make the consumer financial markets fairer and more transparent. Moreover, it is particularly hard to see how even disagreeing with this well supported view justifies the extreme political brinksmanship of refusing to consider a well-qualified nominee in order to extract changes in the law. To follow through on this position in an effort to re-litigate policies that were debated and defeated in 2010 would hold hostage not just the CFPB director, but the future well-being of consumers, financial markets, and the economy.

While we believe there are good arguments that the CFPB can exercise its authority even without a director in place, there is debate about the extent of that authority. By indefinitely blocking confirmation, therefore, Senators would be creating significant uncertainty about the validity of the Bureau's actions and rules. This kind of uncertainty is harmful to consumers and industry alike. Consumers, already suffering from a near-depression caused by inadequate financial regulation, could suffer yet more harm. Financial companies that seek to follow the rules faithfully would be left at the mercy of unregulated, predatory competitors. The overall economy would be put at risk by an inability to take forceful action against abusive lending at a particularly vulnerable time.

The country needs a fully functioning CFPB to underpin a sustained and shared economic recovery. Unfair banking and lending practices helped bring on the financial crisis and the economic freefall that followed. Some of those practices are ongoing, including unfair payday loans that trap consumers in a cycle of debt; deceptive private student lending by schools that make hollow promises of jobs while saddling students with mountains of debt; and robo-calling by debt buyers in pursuit of money that is no longer (or never was) owed. Without a confirmed director, the CFPB's ability to address these and other serious problems remains in doubt.

To the extent that the greatest uncertainty over the CFPB's authority without a director concerns non-banks, blocking the Cordray nomination is particularly pernicious in creating an un-level playing field – to the benefit of payday lenders, debt collectors, credit reporting agencies, mortgage companies, and others. The strategy of the 43 Senators thus stands in the way of establishing fair rules of the road for all players, which ultimately will undermine good practices at community banks and larger depository institutions as well.

The focused mission of the CFPB is to protect consumers in the financial marketplace. The Bureau was created after it became evident that, without fair rules of the road, families were losing uncounted billions of dollars a year, and abusive practices were taking over crucial markets, from mortgages on down to credit cards, payday loans, and the other “last-dollar” providers who prey on consumers with no hope.

Under Director Cordray's leadership, the CFPB has proved to be an open and accessible agency that moves carefully to make markets work better, considering the views of industry players as well as consumers before it acts. We urge you to give top priority to the need to protect consumers and the economy, eliminate uncertainty, and treat both banks and non-banks the same – and to vote to confirm Richard Cordray to a full term as director of the CFPB.

Sincerely,
